Administrative History

Instruction in social work at the University of British Columbia dates back to the late 1920s, at which time the University implemented a two-year diploma course within the Dept. of Economics, Sociology and Political Science. Originally coordinated by S.E. Beckett, and then C.W. Topping, the program slowly expanded. In 1943, Marjorie J. Smith became the first full-time instructor in social work at the University. Two years later the course evolved into the Dept. of Social Work with Smith as its first head. In 1950, the status of the department was again changed as it became the School of Social Work within the Faculty of Arts. In 1999, School of Family and Nutritional Sciences was discontinued and the Family Studies program was transferred to the School of Social Work. The School was then known as the School of Social Work and Family Studies. In 2007, the Family Studies program was moved to the School of Sociology. The School was re-established as the School of Social Work. The school offers Bachelors, Masters, and PHD programs.
