INTRODUCTION

This inventory describes the minute books and the records of the Vancouver & District Labour Council, herein after referred as the VDLC. They document the development of the VDLC in its role in advancing the economic and social welfare of workers. The minute books and records consist of 16 volumes and 17 Hollinger boxes, and extend 6.22 m. They were transferred to the Special Collections and University Archives Division of the University of British Columbia Library February 14, 1990 from the head office of the VDLC.

While the minute books range in date from 1889-1970, the main body of records covers the years 1956 to 1983. In 1989, Frank Kennedy, President of the VDLC at the time, retired and requested that the records prior to 1983 be deposited at the Special Collections Division, University of British Columbia Libraries.¹

Researchers are reminded that while restrictions have not yet been placed on the minute books and records, it is likely that restrictions will be placed given the sensitive nature of some of the material.

The VDLC continues to maintain a record-keeping system at its current office, and it is likely that further accessions will take place.

¹ As told to Jay Gilbert by George Brandak, Manuscripts Curator, Special Collections and University Archives Division, University of British Columbia Library, November 28, 1990.

AGENCY HISTORY

The origins of the Vancouver and District Labour Council (VDLC) can be traced back to 21 November 1889 when the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners (ASCJ) called various union representatives in the city to a meeting at the Sullivan Hall on Cordova Street to discuss the campaign for the nine-hour work day. The various participating unions included the Shaftesbury Local Assembly of the Knights of Labor, the plasters and painters, and carpenters who were not associated with the ASCJ. The result of the meeting was a decision to form a Labour Council to represent "matters pertaining to the welfare of workingmen."² Fifteen days later the Trades and Labour Council of Vancouver (T&LCV) became an official organization.

Formally constituted in January 1890, the T&LCV was funded through per capita fees levied against its affiliate union members. Among the T&LCV's concerns were the problem of scab labour, the running of streetcars on Sundays, and the need to raise funds for a permanent labour hall. By the end of the century the Council was "issu[ing] complaints to employers who paid substandard wages, lobby[ing] for free libraries, evening and technical schools, and called for the establishment of public parks."³

The Council also sought to establish a provincial Federation of Labour. In 1909 the T&LCV lent G. Thompson, of the Streetrailway-men, $50 in order to begin such an organization. Within two years the British Columbia Federation of Labour represented ". . . 39 affiliates, 4 councils and 4 635 members."⁴ The T&LCV considered support of regional labour groups as one of its major roles throughout its history.

Another role assumed by the T&LCV was its participation in civic and provincial politics. As early as 1890, the Council urged members to elect those who would support "such legislation as will most benefit wage earners".⁵ With the Council's help and support, four aldermen were elected in the city of Vancouver during the 1890's. Allied, at various times, with the National Party, the Independent Labour Party, the Federated Labour Party and others, the T&LCV began its tradition of "representing politicians who supported working people's interests."⁶

The early years of the twentieth century, especially during World War One, saw the Council take action against sexism and racism in the workplace as well adopt an anti-conscription policy during the late years of the war. Anti-orientalism and women workers rights were two issues which had divided workers and thus posed concerns for the T&LCV. In 1917, the T&LCV passed an anti-conscription motion.

⁴ Ibid: 19

⁵ Ibid: 23

In addition to supporting individual unions and backing labour candidates in political elections, the T&LCV also supported the call for Canada's first General Strike in 1918. This call was in response to the shooting of Ginger Goodwin, a well known labour organizer from Cumberland, British Columbia. The above examples are illustrative of the T&LCV's concern for social justice, peace and the rights of working people.

In 1919, with a membership of 12 000, there occurred a split in the T&LCV. The Dominion Trades and Labour Congresses held their convention in Calgary that year and at that convention Western delegates withdrew their support and formed the One Big Union (OBU). The OBU was a full-scale industrial union based on socialist policies. The T&LCV supported this action thereby adding almost 2% per capita to the new organization. In retaliation, the Trades and Labour Congress revoked the Council's charter which meant that there were now two separate, but active, labour councils in Vancouver. Following the subsequent decline of the OBU, which was greatly weakened by the public backlash against radical labour organizations after the Winnipeg General Strike of 1919, the Council was reconstituted on a less radical basis in 1920. It was more commonly referred to as the Vancouver Trades and Labour Council (VTLC) after this time.

During the Depression, the Council was almost inactive due to the economic downturn but came back to life with the economic growth that accompanied World War Two. The War also saw the VLC and the VTLC re-establish ties with the formation of a joint committee in 1942. After the war both councils united with other labour bodies to form the "Joint Labour Lobby." In 1956, the two Councils merged to form the Vancouver, Lower Mainland Trades and Labour Council. In the same year, it was renamed the Vancouver and District Labour Council (VDLC), which is as it continues to be known today.

In article 1 of the Constitution & By-laws of the VDLC, the aims and objects of the Labour Council are to extend and strengthen "all labor organizations within its jurisdiction; to co-operate with other local, provincial, Dominion and international federated bodies, and aid legislation whenever possible for the benefit of the workers and producers, and to help secure for them a full remuneration for their labour."

In article II, the purposes of the Labour Council are enunciated as follows: firstly, to support the principles and policies of the Canadian Labour Congress and secondly, to promote the interests of its affiliates and to advance the economic and social welfare of workers generally.

The structure of the executive of the VDLC as defined by the organization is as follows:

President
1st Vice President
2nd Vice President
3rd Vice President
General Secretary-Treasurer
Assistant Secretary
Trustees/ Committee Chairpersons (10)

SCOPE AND CONTENT

The minute books and records of the Vancouver and District Labour Council (VDLC) cover the years 1889-1983 and were transferred to the Special Collections Division of the University of British Columbia on February 14, 1990. The records described in this inventory were removed from the VDLC offices by a representative of the Special Collections Division of the UBC Libraries, and were placed in seventeen Hollinger boxes in the order in which they were found in the filing cabinets in the VDLC office. Appraisal was conducted in the VDLC office at this time. The boxes, originally numbered 1-7, 1-8 and 1-2, were renumbered 1-17 during the course of preparing this inventory.

The minute books cover the years 1889-1970 with the years 1897-1902 and 1917-1918 missing. The VDLC believes that the 1917-1918 Minute books are missing because they were either lost or destroyed when the Labour Temple was occupied by Canadian soldiers during the Ginger Goodwin General Strike in August, 1918.⁷ The 1957-1970 Minute books are in two boxes which have been numbered 16 and 17 and are available with the records of the VDLC.

When the boxed material was first examined, it appeared that the files had been colour-coded by file labels. These coloured labels have, in fact, no bearing on the nature of the office's filing system. They were simply the labels that were purchased at the time.

The minute books and records comprise three series, Series A: Minute Books (1889-1970), Series B: Affiliated unions (1956-1983) and finally, Series C: Subject files (1956-1983). Series and subseries have been established reflecting the subject-based system used in the VDLC offices. Within the Subjects series, there are twenty-one subseries.

In the appendices, complete file lists based upon the arrangement of the minute books and records has been provided for greater access. The sequence of the files reflect in the lists the intellectual arrangement imposed on the minute books and records of the VDLC. The numerical file references provided in the appendices refer first to the box number in which the file is located and secondly to the number of the file within the respective box. These numbers reflect the original physical arrangement of the material which has not been altered.
